

Course Code: 25F_ADV2118_300

Course Name: Canadian Context for Brand Mgmt

Instructor's Name: Jon Parker

Date: 18th November, 2025

Hybrid Assignment #3: When Brands Get
Political- Brand Activism

Submitted by,
Vanshika Saran Sharma

Image Source: Lush.com

Canadian Brand that has taken a stand on political issue: Lush Cosmetics Campaign Name:
Lush: How #92 Shampoo Bar Supports Truth & Reconciliation

Issue: This campaign supports the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada's 94 Calls to Action released by the federal government in 2015, it specifically addresses Call to Action number 92, which outlines the role of businesses in advancing reconciliation. That is why the campaign is named How the #92 Shampoo Bar Supports Truth and Reconciliation. Canadian Link: This campaign by Lush Cosmetics was launched in response to the Canadian government's calls to action and is in reference to harms done in the history of Canada to the Indigenous peoples. It is deeply rooted in Canada's political, social and historical context.

Campaign Link: https://www.lush.com/ca/en_ca/a/supporting-truth-and-reconciliation
Summary of the campaign efforts:

To contribute meaningfully to truth and reconciliation efforts in Canada, Lush Cosmetics introduced a limited edition, new shampoo bar named the #92 Shampoo Bar, and all proceeds, apart from taxes, are given entirely to Indigenous organizations that are actively leading and supporting reconciliation work. What also stands out about this launch is that the product is completely waste-free since it requires no packaging, the shampoo bar itself is coloured orange to align with Orange Shirt Day, each bar is stamped with "#92" to represent the specific Call to Action it supports, and even the fragrance was developed in collaboration with an Indigenous-owned and operated organization (Nunumus Management Limited) making the entire campaign a thoughtful and intentional reinforcement of its purpose.

Were the brands drawn into controversy, or did they intentionally take a stand?:

This is an intentional stand by Lush Cosmetics. I feel this because Lush recognized an opportunity in the growing awareness of the harms done to the Indigenous community and decided to take a brave step forward by donating the proceeds and financially supporting Indigenous organizations. It was intentional, as even though the government had made a public announcement about the calls to action, Lush proactively and deliberately invested in product creation and innovation, thoughtfully integrating the elements to support Truth & Reconciliation.

Type of strategy (responsive or proactive): The type of strategy used is proactive, as Lush Cosmetics did not wait to be involved by some other brand or target audience; they saw this opportunity, invested in new product creation, and launched it.

Was the strategy a good move for the brand? Why/why not?:

This strategy was a good move for Lush Cosmetics because it shows that the brand cares for the Indigenous peoples and is not ignorant of the issues at the core of Canada. Lush markets itself as proudly Canadian made hence it is very important for the brand to take a stance proactively to the issues that land home to the hearts of the Canadian consumer. This product was specifically made for the Canadian market and created positive conversations about the brand. It placed the brand as a conscious and responsible brand due to this campaign. This campaign got the brand in talks not just in Canada but also, in other countries due to its exclusivity. In August, 2025, they shared that they were able to fund 5 Indigenous led Organisations with \$127,000 and it was a fulfilling experience for both the brand and the customers.

AI Disclosure: This document was reviewed using ChatGPT (GPT-5 mini). The prompt provided was: "Identify any spelling mistakes only." No content was altered or generated beyond these corrections.